Question 4

Read the following passage carefully and answer the questions that follow:

[20]

It was a warm afternoon in the small town of Malgudi. The streets were quiet and the shops were closing for the midday break. The scent of jasmine and dry earth hung in the air. Swami, a young boy with a curious mind and a head full of questions, was returning home from school, swinging his bag absentmindedly and humming a tune.

As he walked past the banyan tree near the village temple — the tree that children often avoided because of the old stories about spirits that lived in it — he noticed a long, dark object lying motionless on the ground. At first, he thought it was a stick but something about it made him stop.

Swami stepped closer and looked suspiciously. It was a snake, coiled tightly and blending perfectly with the dry grass beneath it. Its body shimmered slightly under the sun. For a moment, Swami felt a surge of fear rise in his chest — the kind of fear that makes you want to run without looking back. But then his natural curiosity took over. He had heard many stories about snakes from his grandfather — some frightening, some fascinating — but he had never seen one so closely.

The snake appeared calm. Swami crouched down cautiously, keeping a safe distance. He reached out a hand, hesitantly, just to feel the air between them. Suddenly, the snake flicked its tongue and shifted slightly in the grass. Swami stumbled back, his heart pounding but he did not scream. Instead, he stood frozen, eyes wide with wonder.

At that moment, a deep voice called out from behind him. It was the village elder, a man with a walking stick and silver hair, known for his wisdom and knowledge of animals and nature. “Don’t worry,” he said gently. “That snake is harmless. It is a rat snake — not venomous. In fact, it helps the village by keeping the rats away.”

Swami exhaled in relief, though his legs still trembled. The elder came forward and stood beside him, both now watching the snake as it slowly uncoiled and slithered towards a nearby bush. Its movement was elegant.

Swami spent the rest of the afternoon listening to the village elder talk about snakes, birds and the forest that once bordered the village. The stories were filled with awe and respect, not fear. When Swami finally walked home, the sun was lower in the sky and the air had cooled.

That evening, he told his family about the snake and all that he had learnt. He realized that fear often comes from not knowing — from imagining the worst. From that day on, Swami looked at the world around him with new eyes — not just with curiosity but also with understanding and kindness.
